Q: How can I force upstart to fork a service on boot and let it start as a single-user daemon? Background: I'm running an Ubuntu 14.04 LTS system with several services running: ufw, sshd, postfix, cron, upstart, dovecot, bind, munin, and nodejs. I've configured upstart to run the same set of services each time I boot the system, starting them in the order they should be started. Everything works fine, except that it forked every service as root. To force things to work as normal users I've added an "export DEBFULLNAME=root" line to my /etc/profile, and I use /usr/sbin/useradd -s /bin/bash -c root -d /home/root to create a root user account with a default home directory and a shell of /bin/bash. The problem: When booting the system up for the first time, all services run as root, not as the user I created. Is there a way to ensure that services start as the user I specified, rather than as root? A: This is by design; "forking" a process starts it as the user who called upstart, not the user who calls the executable. The solution is to run the process as root, but setuid it afterwards. Bundled up in a raincoat and a black hat, the professor entered the house through the back door and moved through the
