Influence of donor lung size on outcome in pediatric lung transplantation. Nonsized single lung transplantation is a common procedure in children, but the effect of donor lung size on transplant outcomes has not been determined. Fifty-seven consecutive single lung transplant recipients, with 469 total lung transplants, were divided into three groups based on donor lung size (group I: or= 41%, n = 11). Operative characteristics, postoperative course, and survival were compared among the three groups. There were no significant differences in the following parameters among the groups: age, donor age, mean ischemic time, donor gender, induction therapy, use of extracorporeal circulation, intraoperative complications, and type of pulmonary pathologies. In comparison with the large-size group, the small-size group had a longer ischemic time (36.0 vs. 14.5 minutes, p
