A journey through the highly-anticipated first season of The Walking Dead which premieres January 15th. Thousands of people are about to lose their shit over the Walking Dead. The soon to be released AMC series, which has filmed in Atlanta for the last year, has already received more Emmy nominations than any scripted series on television and is being billed as the next Game of Thrones. It's a pretty big deal for AMC, whose CEO Josh Sapan has said that it was the biggest achievement of his career. It's also a big deal for the producer and studio that created the zombie epic, Skybound Entertainment. The film makers behind series such as The Walking Dead, Homecoming, and Patriot have grown like mushrooms after a heavy downpour of cash from the Walking Dead's director and executive producer Frank Darabont. The movie industry term that goes with this massive cash influx is "studio-level" and it has been a huge deal for the team behind The Walking Dead. According to Skybound CEO Nick Grad, every cent of their profit since they started selling their show has been going to Darabont and his team. They've had more success selling TV rights around the world than films and other production companies. "The Walking Dead has been consistently No. 1 in terms of viewer share in the U.S. and we've sold to more international territories than any other show ever," Grad says. He's probably lying, but if he's not he's probably just saying what we're all thinking. Speaking at the 2013 Los Angeles Screen Actors Guild (SAG) awards, Darabont explained the change in focus to Grad: I've been addicted to the day time soap "Gilmore Girls" and I think I've secretly gotten into this whole
