Looking for a cheaper way to get to the airport? A little friendly competition can prove lucrative, according to a new report by SmartFly, a public relations and events company that promotes a new airline, OXI (OXI flies to Islamabad and Doha) the subject of the report. Though it's a private venture, OXI is "the perfect example of how the business of business aviation is about more than just travel," Pavin Waterman, CEO of SmartFly, told CNN Business. "We work with a series of companies who have realized that they can grow their business by tapping into the same customer base as the airlines, without the cost and complexity of flying a flight." As a route to Islamabad, OXI is appealing because it's one of the cheapest options, Waterman said. His company is working with the officials of the OXI in Doha, as well as the airport. "The airport at Doha is investing heavily in their modern terminal," Waterman said. "The airport is being upgraded and to accommodate the growing numbers of passengers that are traveling to Doha." Air travel between the United States and Europe -- or to any other destination -- gets most of the attention, but there are plenty of international flights in the United States, too. Plus, the rise of new, low-cost airlines has been giving travellers more options, according to Travel Weekly. Low-cost airlines are a popular route for tourists, and the rise of these upstarts has led to a rise in traffic, new routes, and new destinations. Leveraging business opportunities Being new, OXI is still trying to hit its stride. As a private airline, it's not likely to offer as many amenities as a major airline, but OXI is taking advantage of unique opportunities, to the benefit of both passengers and businesses. "Rather than fly business class for the majority of its flights, OXI will fly business class on only one or two flights per week as it explores who the best business partners are, the destinations most in demand, and the best ways to provide service to them," OXI CEO Thomas Menzel told CNN Business. What's more, since it is a private company, OXI is able to charge passengers lower prices, and it's creating a savings plan for companies seeking to access the Doha business market.
