Study of two groups of patients, one without polyneuropathy, the other with peripheral neuropathy]. Two groups of patients, both in treatment for chronic renal failure, were investigated for the presence of polyneuropathy. For this, a sensitive and reliable method has been used, namely, the measurement of biologic markers in plasma and in CSF by the RIA technique.

The two groups of patients have been compared in terms of their plasma and CSF values of two vasoactive substances, norepinephrine (NA) and histamine, which have been reported to be increased in peripheral neuropathy. The results obtained demonstrate that both patients and healthy subjects have high levels of NA and histamine in plasma, but that the values found in CSF are about twofold as high in patients as in controls.

Furthermore, NA values are higher than histamine values in CSF of patients, but not in controls. The values found in plasma in the healthy subjects and in patients were similar to those reported previously by other authors. The study of patients without neuropathy revealed very high concentrations of histamine in plasma and CSF, whereas NA values were slightly higher than in controls. However, the values of these two substances found in the CSF of the patients were similar to the values found in controls. The comparison of these values with those of patients with peripheral neuropathy revealed only slight differences between the groups. This suggests that the increased values of the vasoactive substances in CSF of patients with neuropathy are due to the depression of
